INTERNATIONAL SCIENCE AND POLICY WORKSHOP

The “Arab Revolutions” as a Challenge for Islam and Muslims in the EU and their Perception in Europe

Future Perspectives for Socio-economic Sciences and Humanities Research

9 February 2012

Abstract:

The so-called “Arab Revolutions” in the Maghreb Region and in the Near and Middle East in early 2011 have to be considered one of the crucial historical turnarounds and paradigm shifts of the beginning 21st century. As a consequence of their unforeseeable primarily secular nature and due to their basic-democratic “bottom-up” character, a bunch of questions arises such as to the cross-linkages, interconnections and interaction between Arab and Muslim communities in Europe and in the MENA region, which had an impact on the political discourses and agendas; or as to the influence of these developments on Arab and Muslim communities, their self-perception and political status in the EU.

Moreover, the question has to be raised, whether the ongoing revolutionary processes in the Arab and Muslim world have already affected and changed the European perception of the Arab and Islamic world and its readiness for democracy. Thus, finally, we have to ask: Is there a specific need to re-consider or to change, modify or adopt new forms of religious regimes and political governance towards Muslim communities in Europe in the aftermath of the Arab Revolutions? And how to (re-) establish a fruitful and sustainable dialogue with old and new Arab resp. Muslim social, cultural, economic, political and religious elites both within the EU and beyond, in particular in the post-revolutionary states in the European neighbourhood?
